The Egyptian Museum, Luxor was built during the reign of king Ramesses III (1279-1213 BC), and covers an area of 15,000 m². It houses the largest collection of ancient Egyptian artefacts in the world, displaying every type of artefact from all the eras of Egyptian history. It is considered the pinnacle of the Luxor Archaeological Museum. Built in 1875, the museum is the largest of its kind in the Middle East. It is built on the site of the ancient palace of king Amenhotep III (1366-1351 BC), who lived in this palace during the middle of the 13th century BC. The main structure consists of the Royal Seraglio Pavilion, the Royal Treasury, the Hall of Masks, the Hall of Colours and the Hall of the Thousand Columns. The first part of the museum houses the collection of the finds from the royal palaces of Amenhotep III. The museum was founded in 1845 by Austrian diplomat Leopold König. He wanted to create an institution that would preserve the ancient monuments and relics of the Egyptian people. It is currently housed in two buildings, namely the “old” and “new” museum. The exhibition of the royal palaces is composed of eleven rooms. They are arranged around the principal rooms of the King's living quarters. The exhibition starts with the first hall of the Seraglio, the main reception room where the King would sleep when he visited the palace. After, one enters the room where the royal wife would sleep during her husband's absence. Next, one enters the women's reception room, where the Queen would sit to receive visitors, dressed in a bright blue robe that symbolises the sky. The next room is the room of the treasury. It was a room filled with precious stones, jewellery and other ornaments. The last room is the room of the Scribe, where the King's officials would work. It is a room with many beautiful carvings on the walls.

With more than 2 million Americans taking the drug, it is safe to say heroin has created more than its share of havoc. The drug's effects on the body are deadly. Heroin is so powerful that one user can kill eight people. In most cases, the victims don't know that they are being slowly but surely poisoned to death. As a result of a nationwide heroin epidemic, more and more people are becoming addicted. The number of people using heroin has increased so dramatically that our modern society seems to be in a crisis as never before. As one can imagine, heroin use is a problem not only among poor, inner city blacks but among all Americans, including those in suburban and wealthy communities. The tragic part is, not enough Americans are aware that heroin use is so widespread. We must help to raise awareness of the seriousness of this problem, in addition to providing information on how to recognize, treat and prevent heroin use. This is the second in a series of five books that address the heroin crisis in America. The first book, titled Heroin, was published in 1988. It contains information on heroin use, the heroin user, how drugs are made, the effects of heroin use, treatment, and many other aspects of this growing epidemic. Heroin: Voices from the Streets is a part of the equally popular and successful Heroin: The Information Book series. The first book, Heroin
