The site is operated by the Idaho National Laboratory under contract with the United States Army. The site was previously operated as the Great Salt Lake Army Depot by the U.S. Army Signal Corps during World War I, and is used as a testing ground for chemical weapons, biological weapons, and unguided rockets. History World War I During World War I, the U.S. Army Signal Corps operated the Great Salt Lake Army Depot at Dugway, Utah. The depot was used to store and employ ammunition and equipment. This included the production of artillery shells, poisonous gas, and incendiary bombs. During World War I, the Depot served the Army as a temporary base of operations and a testing ground. It was used as an ammunition depot during World War I and World War II. It was also used to produce mortar shells. In 1926, the U.S. Army became concerned that the Great Salt Lake was not providing protection for large artillery pieces that were being stored at the depot. To alleviate this concern, the U.S. Army contracted with the United States Forest Service to determine the feasibility of building a permanent proving ground. The proving ground was conceived as a place for the Army to test different types of munitions. This included chemical, biological and explosive shells. By 1929, the proving ground was up and running. The proving ground was completed in 1934 and was named Dugway Proving Ground. At that time, the proving ground was used for research and testing of land
