Girl Scouts are facing controversy in New York after a troop of girls allegedly caught a fellow Girl Scout leader in the act of having a male escort at their annual cookout, accusing her of trying to blackmail them into keeping their mouths shut. The Girl Scouts of Greater New York said the encounter had "nothing to do with sex," according to a statement released on Tuesday. Girl Scouts official Joan Rinaldi said the alleged incident occurred over the weekend in the Bronx. "They feel (the troop leader) made herself the object of attention of our troops for her own entertainment," Rinaldi said, according to NBC New York. Girl Scouts reported the incident to the police, the television station reported. "During a troop event, we were alerted to an incident involving a troop leader who was being inappropriate with a male escort," according to the Girl Scouts of Greater New York. "The girl scouts is a place where families can come together to share activities, foster community and build confidence, character, and leadership skills," the Girl Scouts said in a statement. The New York Daily News reported the escorts was hired to attend the event. Girl Scouts CEO Sylvia Acevedo released a statement saying the troop's experience was "inconsistent with what a Girl Scout offers its members." Clan Auld Clan Auld is an ancient Scottish clan, that takes its name from one of the families which settled in the Carrick area of Lanarkshire, where their stronghold was at Aberdalgie in the Parish of Kilbarchan. Etymology According to the Gaelic Siol Alpin the surname Auld comes from the name of Eoghan Dubh (Old Black of Aulad). Dubh is the Old Norse for dark. Eoghan's own surname was MacCrimmon
