## Exploiting Microsoft Office Applications

There are many methods of exploiting the vulnerabilities in Microsoft Office (e.g., Word, Excel, Outlook, Publisher, PowerPoint, etc.). All of these vulnerabilities are exploitable if the user is enabled to have remote access. * Word, Excel and PowerPoint have [known remote code execution vulnerabilities]( * Outlook can have [a logic flaw]( that can result in arbitrary memory modification if the user is tricked into opening a specially crafted e-mail. * Publisher has a logic flaw that can result in arbitrary memory modification if the user is tricked into opening a specially crafted file. There are also a few issues in the Clip Gallery. First, there is a web-based repository for Microsoft Office documents. A malicious file can be added to the repository. If the repository is accessed, it will allow the attacker to upload a document to the system that can run arbitrary JavaScript code. Another way of exploiting Office is via a webpage. An attacker can create a simple webpage that uploads a document to the repository. The attacker can then use the repository to upload arbitrary documents that can do whatever they like. The attacker can also create a hyperlink to the repository. By clicking the link, the user will be taken to the document repository where an attacker can upload a malicious document that can run arbitrary code. This web-based method of exploitation is also used by the Exploits::MacOSX module, as described below. ## Exploiting Microsoft Windows Applications There are also a few ways of exploiting the vulnerabilities in Microsoft Windows.
