Nanoemulsion containing cinnamon and its antinociceptive effects: a strategy for management of postoperative pain. This study was conducted to determine the effect of nanoemulsion containing cinnamon extract on postoperative pain and its possible mechanisms of action. Mice were randomly assigned into one of the following five groups: the treatment group received nanoemulsion containing cinnamon extract orally, while the control group received nanoemulsion containing olive oil for 21 days. All mice were then given a number of different antinociceptive tests to determine the effect of cinnamon extract. Results showed that cinnamon extract had a better antinociceptive effect than olive oil. In addition, the pharmacological effects of nanoemulsion containing cinnamon extract (i) were due to its effect on calcium channels in peripheral and central neurons, (ii) were related to the inhibition of inflammatory mediators, (iii) induced the release of endorphins, (iv) were related to the inhibition of protein kinase C, and (v) were associated with the activation of protein kinase A. Nanoemulsion containing cinnamon extract may be a promising drug for the management of postoperative pain. Connect with Us Community market in the works at Regency Square With
