(1) Field of the Invention The present invention relates to storage bins and, more particularly, to a two-compartment storage bin wherein access from one compartment to the other is provided. (2) Description of the Prior Art Storage bins of this general type are commonly used in the household to store items such as soaps, trash bags, laundry, food, tools, etc. These containers provide a convenient means for storing items and minimizing the number of drawers or cupboards which must be used to store items such as these. The containers also allow items to be stored in a convenient location which is easily accessible. One type of container which is commonly used is of the type which is in the form of a bin having a removable lid or top cover for covering the contents of the container. An example of such a container is illustrated in U.S. Pat. No. 4,832,232 which is owned by the assignee of the present application. A problem with storage bins of this type is that there is no convenient means for providing access between the first compartment or the lower compartment and the second compartment or the upper compartment. For example, if it is desired to access an item which is placed in the lower compartment from the upper compartment, it is necessary to remove the lid from the upper compartment to gain access to the lower compartment. This, of course, requires the removal of the lid and may be inconvenient when it is desired to perform another activity such as using a towel. The above described problem is recognized in the art and various approaches have been attempted in order to provide access between compartments of a storage bin. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 2,290,794 discloses a storage container which includes two containers or compartments with a dividing wall between them. The access opening for the top compartment is provided in the dividing wall. The dividing wall may be removed, however, to gain access to the bottom compartment. U.S. Pat. No. 2,720,047 discloses a storage container of this general type wherein the partition wall is formed by two L-shaped parts which are hinged together by pins to allow for removal of the partition to access the bottom compartment.
