versionQ: Grid layout in C# i am learning about grid layout in c#. I created two grids. Each grid has two columns, where, all the four items are of type (Grid.RowDefinitions, Grid.ColumnDefinitions). The first grid fills the entire form while the second one has a smaller Height, compared to the first. Both grids contains different controls. What I expect is, that the first grid should have the same height as the second one. In other words, that both columns should have the same height. The controls of the second grid do not grow in height, the first one should. When I set a specific height and width to each control - it works. I am wondering, whether I am doing the right thing here. I guess that there is some other layout I have to use, because the layout I have here seems to be a more decent solution for the structure of the application. As a solution, I am using property IsVisible to hide/show the Grid-Items. A: I am working with about 3 years of development experience on .Net. I made some tests with GridLayout in .Net 4.5... The user profile with AutoSize set to both should fill the entire page to the left and right edges. This looks like what you should be looking for. In case you just want to change some layouts for different reasons you can also use VisualStyleRenderer to achieve the desired appearance (layout) quickly. Otherwise - you should be using datagrids and you should be wrapping each grid in a panel or even better a frame or forms itself (to do this layout the way you specified). Also - you should not be using GridLayout with row & coldefinitions you should use a panel and dock each control to the panel (theoretically). If you want to learn how to do this search for docky using the framework extension docked. I forgot to mention that VisualStyleRenderer can only apply to windows created with WinForms Designer.

Smart off-track wagers that can be placed online allow someone to place bets, which require wagers on horse races, and in many cases, also bookies can be involved. The bookmaker is going to accumulate a number of bets on a particular horse, and place the wagers according to the rules of the bookie. At the end of the day, the bookie will either place more money on a horse than is being wagered, and he may be able to afford to collect a 50 percent return.
