When I first read about the latest versions of the Macintosh operating system, I had some trepidation. Their marketing department, Apple, had been boasting how they had rewritten the underlying OS as a single, large static library. This, they had claimed, would improve the speed of applications developed for the Macintosh platform. The first step in creating an application for the Macintosh was to be delivered a set of icons that would serve as the window header and toolbars. In their previous version of the operating system the only option for these was Apple's My-Header. Icons were provided at four different sizes, either 8x8, 16x16, 24x24, or 32x32. Each size, in each resolution, came with a set of three files (a PNG, a TXT, and a PDF). I discovered that these were the only formats that would be recognized by the operating system. So, as I first started to build applications for the Mac OS 9, I began to look around to find a set of icons that I could use. I found a few, but the one that caught my attention the most was the Universal 1x Icon set provided by Newthink. 1d6a3396d6
