[Clinical study of the Z-maxillectomy]. From 1986 to 1994, we have treated 91 patients with obstructive sleep apnea syndrome, who underwent mandibular surgery. After 1-3 years follow-up, the 3-year recurrence rate of operation was 43% and the recurrent rate of the Z-maxillectomy was 1.1 times more than the velopharyngostoma. We therefore conclude that Z-maxillectomy is the best treatment for the patients with obstructive sleep apnea syndrome.

Keywords Metabolic syndrome status and age at menopause: The moderating role of other clinical markers. MedLine Citation: PMID: 21937045 Owner: NLM Status: MEDLINE Abstract/OtherAbstract: The purpose of this study was to examine the moderating role of other clinical markers of the metabolic syndrome and the age at menopause on the relationship between metabolic syndrome and age at menopause. The data were from a population-based study of 7,226 women who were examined between 1996 and 2000. Metabolic syndrome was defined as the presence of three or more of the following measures: central obesity, raised blood pressure, raised fasting blood glucose, high triglycerides, and reduced high-density lipoproteins. Menopause was defined as the onset of spontaneous amenorrhea associated with a change in a woman's menstrual pattern. Age at menopause was categorized into five groups (up to 40, 41 to 45, 46 to 49, 50 to 54, and 55 years and older). A woman's metabolic status was recorded by her categorization of the number of clinical factors of the metabolic syndrome. The most prevalent factor for the metabolic syndrome was raised triglycerides (19.7%). Menopause was associated with a progressive increase in the number of clinical factors of the metabolic syndrome and elevated fasting glucose from those with no symptoms of the syndrome (no clinical factors) to those with at least four clinical factors. Age at menopause was not associated with a change in the number of factors of the metabolic syndrome. A multiple regression model revealed that menopause increased the number of factors of the metabolic syndrome independent of age and body mass index. Other clinical factors, including cigarette smoking, blood pressure, and fasting blood glucose, increased the number of factors of the metabolic syndrome. This study has indicated a positive relationship between menopause and the development of features of the metabolic syndrome and a negative association between this syndrome and age at menopause.
