Photoshop's history As Adobe Systems was beginning to develop Photoshop, a feature was tacked onto the program that would evolve into the industry standard today. Photoshop 3.0 made its debut in 1992, and it was a complete visual imaging program, making the program nearly a competitor to Adobe's own full-featured graphics program, Illustrator. The 3.0 version of Photoshop contained the three tools: draw, paint, and enhance. The fourth version, 3.5, added a few more tools, such as tools for creating web graphics. And the 5.0 version saw the release of the channel dialog. The lightest version of Photoshop that used the original print technology is what has become known as Photoshop CS1, which is now a discontinued version. Photoshop's growing popularity Today, you can't buy Photoshop without a copy of Photoshop CS2. CS2 is a version that is full-featured, and has been around since 2001. Photoshop's software engineer Gil Penchina says that when he was working at Adobe, people were used to Photoshop as a standard tool. They weren't used to seeing Photoshop's software engineer working on other Adobe products. Penchina said that it's not just Adobe's software engineers who are using Photoshop: People who make money are only doing jobs where they are allowed to use Photoshop. In fact, Penchina says that Photoshop is now the program used by the majority of artists in the industry. For example, Penchina says that he sees the amount of Photoshop CS users at a trade show increase every year. Penchina says that Photoshop has become a common tool in the hands of people who are not intended for graphic design: Photoshop is something that everyone understands, and most people know how to use. Penchina said that Photoshop has become almost a verb in everyday language: It's a common word. A lot of people say, "I've got to put my photos through Photoshop," or "I've got to give this a Photoshop makeover." Where to get Photoshop If you are looking for Photoshop, you can get it at numerous online retailers. You can buy a copy of Adobe Photoshop CS or CS2 from Amazon. Penchina said that if you have made it this far, you might have many questions. Whether you are buying a pre-loaded computer or simply needing to install it

Show HN: I made a simple website for my kids. It's a boardgame. - mck- ===== neilk So I tried it out. It's simple and fun. I think you could do better. Here are some things that immediately stood out as problems: Some element of clarity is needed on the pricing: • I went to the page that says: > Diners $2.99 per meal, with a $5.99 minimum for 10 meals. That needs to say clearly that you can't buy less than 10 meals. The fee to start is $6.99, but there is no clear explanation of what the restriction means. • On some pages there are links that say "join" without any indication whatsoever that it's actually joining anything. • The graphs are extremely high-resolution. • It's simply impossible to pay $5.99 for 10 meals with your primary account. • The comic at the bottom of each page needs to be a little more carefully designed. The fonts are too small for the text. Also I don't think your text is allowed to flow into the background. Anyway, I think your app is really, really cool. Keep going. ---- travjones Thanks for the feedback! We've debated how to handle the "join it now" sections; we initially went with "join it now" until we realized we needed other ways for customers to react to the second chance coupons, which were buggy and confusing. We're currently working on a way for customers to react to the coupons, and we'll be reevaluating our "join it now" landing page. As for the graphs, are you saying they're too detailed? The point is for customers to have flexibility in how they display graphs (yes, they'll be big, so we don't want them to be unreadable). Thanks again for the feedback! ---- neilk Maybe this is too pedantic, but are you sure about the number of meals? 10 seem very high for an adult. ---- travjones Thanks for your feedback! It was a debate among the team; we didn't want to lower the meal count.

Civil Impunity: Desire to Criminalize Rape in India Rape, both rape of men and women, by the state has become a matter of serious public concern. Unfortunately, even though there has been a phenomenal response to civil, socio-political and socio-legal ways of dealing with gender-based violence since the first Women's March on New York City in 1991, the situation has remained virtually unchanged, even though reforms have been promulgated and implemented. Sharing this grave concern, at a recent seminar on 'Concepts of Violence in Modern Society' organised by the Sridevi Institute for Social and Development Studies and the Sridevi Institute for Legal Studies (SILS), on July 14, 2013, in New Delhi, a discussion on the concept of 'civil impunity' and the problem of rape in society was held. The speaker on the topic was Mr P.N. Rajeevan, Lecturer, Centre for Interdisciplinary Research in Legal Studies, S.V. College for Women, University of Delhi, and Visiting Associate Professor, School of Law, De Paul University, Chicago. Addressing the gathering in the seminar, which was attended by the heads of various institutions and universities of Delhi, Mr Rajeevan drew attention to the institution of police and the subsequent impunity that it has brought about in India's criminal justice system. He said that in a society where rape of a woman by a man is a criminal offence, the institution of police has become the principal instrument in ensuring that women do not avail the protection of criminal justice in relation to gender-based violence. In India, however, as police investigations happen before any court hearing takes place, the police can simply file closure report and that fact that the case was closed would prevent a survivor of rape from claiming it as an important part of her evidence. In this context, while all states and Union Territories have made provisions for swift, independent and speedy investigation of all crimes against women, only five states – Punjab, Uttarakhnad, Himachal Pradesh, Jammu and Kashmir and Delhi – have established special fast track courts to adjudicate cases of rape, sexual assault and stalking. This means that the moment a woman discloses that she has been raped by her husband or by someone in his family, police file an FIR in a jurisdiction outside that of the woman's residence. As a result, the victim of rape is forced to approach police
