Category: Windows software This invention is related to the field of digital circuit design and, more particularly, to a method and apparatus for producing a final netlist from a series of netlists generated during a design cycle. Many complex circuits have been designed by a system of logic using a netlist. A netlist is a description of a circuit, which includes a collection of instances of a circuit component, such as transistors, resistor and capacitor and a plurality of wires which connect the circuit components. A common representation of a netlist is as a directed graph or graph of interconnected nodes. A node is an electronic component of the netlist, such as a transistor, resistor or capacitor. The electrical connections between nodes represent the paths or interconnections between circuit components. Each node is uniquely labeled with an identity of the component and a data field defining the properties of the component. For example, the data field may describe the input or output terminals of the component, the size of the component, the current flowing through the component, etc. The identity is typically represented by a sequence of
