Removal of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons from soil using microencapsulated bentonite. Bentonite is an effective material for the removal of environmental contaminants. This study investigated the behavior of microencapsulated bentonite (MBC) as a remedial material for the removal of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAHs) from soil. The presence of MBC increases the adsorption capacity of bentonite. The degree of dispersion of the MBC was determined by measuring the magnetic susceptibility of MBC before and after adsorption. In addition, the structural changes of the adsorbed and free MBC were determined by X-ray diffraction. The adsorption capacity of MBC was higher than that of free bentonite. However, the equilibrium time was longer for MBC. The adsorption of MBC was best described by the Freundlich isotherm model, suggesting a heterogeneous mechanism. The adsorption mechanism was confirmed by FTIR spectroscopy. The kinetic model was described by a pseudo-first-order rate equation. These results demonstrated that the removal of PAHs from soil was enhanced by the addition of MBC, and that the functionalized bentonite increased the adsorption capacity of bentonite.
