A technique has been developed for the measurement of the signal-to-noise ratio (SNR) in generalized phase encoding (GPE) NMR imaging. The measurement is based on an assumption about the data covariance structure, namely that the noise power spectrum is proportional to frequency. GPE imaging samples an arbitrarily shaped region at a spatially varying constant nominal resolution, and, consequently, the SNR can vary spatially over the imaging region. The magnitude of the SNR variations is analyzed in terms of the data covariance matrix, and an estimate of the SNR is obtained. As an example, a SNR map is derived from a standard GPE imaging experiment.
