It is with great regret, that we have to announce the withdrawal of funding for the event The Little Tree. We have been asked by others to help assist with the event but have been unable to accommodate their request. It is with a heavy heart that we do not feel that we can use the space and contribute to an event, which was created to help young people in the community and has a charitable aim. We appreciate that some in the wider community may wish to do a fundraising appeal, but we wish to make it clear that we will not be giving permission for The Little Tree to use our name or the space to be used for fundraising. We apologise to all who have already purchased tickets and are registered for the event. We also apologise for the disappointment and inconvenience caused. Tickets will be refunded on request. and helpful as well. And finally thanks to my husband - for your presence, patience and infinite support. Wednesday, April 9, 2009 * I always have to look for reasons to blame something on someone when it comes to my choice not to eat something. So will continue - in fact, I have a feeling I already have a reason to blame someone for most of my choices in life. And let's make it easy here: My husband. He's the reason I stay home with the kids, the reason I want to eat healthier, the reason I get upset if I don't eat enough, the reason I don't eat enough, the reason I crave chocolate, the reason I have to be so careful what I eat. Sure, I don't want to stay at home, I love to work, and I love to cook, but without all the above he wouldn't have the necessary reasons to make my choices even harder. And that's it. I have three kids to cook for, so I have to choose the healthier options or else I may make myself sick. I love to cook and I love kids, but I don't love the daily struggle of choosing something healthy and something that kids can a69d392a70
