Just plug your i.Finger Reader to your PC and Windows will now find it and you can sign in as usual. You can also hold the device in proximity to the on-screen fingerprint reader to directly identify yourself, thus getting into any application on the system - including Microsoft Windows and Linux. Not only that, the app is also capable of unlocking your desktop when used with existing password authentication. The app uses basic fingerprint authentication, meaning that users do not have to create and remember special PINs for different applications. For those of you, who want to access your machine without a password, you can store your fingerprint PIN on a USB stick, and load it automatically to allow access. You can also allow other people to access your machine via this technology. For instance, you could implement this feature so that you could not use your machine until you have unlocked it yourself. This would be a convenient way to prevent others from watching you on Facebook, while you are stuck at work. Furthermore, the fingerprint device is small and can be kept in a pocket or a purse, so you can always have it on hand to log into your system. The software

Printer and Color Cartridge Test and Calibration

Q: Adding constraint logic into my LINQ to Entities query I'm writing a method that will loop through about 50,000 jobs and delete ones that are old (so say 6 months old). So far I've been generating my query and have been getting great results. However, when I go to loop through the results I want to put a constraint on the property being != to a specific date. I looked at this question (LINQ to Entities: Adding criteria inside select), but am unsure where to insert it.

public bool
DeleteOldJobs(DateTime? start_date) { List jobs; DateTime today = DateTime.Now; if

---

```
(start_date.HasValue) { DateTime start_date
= start_date.Value; DateTime end_date = today.AddMonths(6); string my_where =
"WHERE start_date = @1"; jobs = (from j in db.Jobs where
j.StartDate.Value.CompareTo(start_date) == 0 &&
j.EndDate.Value.CompareTo(end_date) == 0 select j).ToList(); foreach (var job in jobs) {
if (job.Location.HasValue)
db.JobLocations.Remove(job.Location);
