The aim of this study was to develop a standardized classification of localized atrial tachyarrhythmias based on their mechanisms and their respective localizations. Localized atrial tachyarrhythmias exhibit multiple locations, each possibly associated with a different mechanism, the mechanism being related to the precise site of the arrhythmia and how the conduction system is affected. Terminology has been generally eclectic. A new classification has been proposed based on the location of the tachyarrhythmia, the mechanism, and the background. Localized atrial tachyarrhythmias are arrhythmias that can be located, their mechanism known, and their background understood. They may involve any of the atrial sites. Tachycardias with 2:1 atrioventricular block carry the highest risks of developing atrial fibrillation or flutter as well as of sudden cardiac death. Focal atrial tachycardia and atrial flutter carry high risks of atrial fibrillation and flutter, whereas antidromic tachycardia, reflecting a generally proximal atrial conduction disturbance, carries a moderate risk. The complexity of interactions between mechanisms, the involvement of different atrial sites, and the different pathways connecting these sites dictate the possibilities of therapy and the risks to the patient. Each localized atrial tachyarrhythmia type should be considered separately when evaluating, diagnosing, and treating this type of arrhythmia.Cytologic diagnosis of malignant lymphoma in effusions by cytomorphologic features and new techniques.
