One of the more popular forms of flight simulation is to simulate the movement of a pilot or pilot and passenger in an aircraft and impart an inertia to various portions of the aircraft. This can be accomplished by either simulating the effects of gravity on the aircraft or, using the same type of force that is commonly used to power the engines of an aircraft. For example, it is known to use the force of gravity on a flight simulator by suspending the aircraft model in a bed of rocks or by holding a plurality of rocks in suspension and moving the model back and forth to simulate thrust of the aircraft engine. While these gravity-imparted inertial simulators are useful, they are not without drawbacks. For example, the simulators are difficult to employ and are difficult to control. Accordingly, what is needed is a gravity-imparted flight simulator that is easy to use and inexpensive to manufacture.Q: Convert a string to a hash Ruby has the nifty method :to_h for converting data structures to hashes. Is there a way to convert a string (or byte array) to a hash? Is it safe to do something like this? irb(main):002:0> s = "Good morning" => "Good morning" irb(main):003:0> s.to_hash => {:good=>"morning"} A: There's Hash[*h], which works on a string. s.to_hash 1cb139a0ed
