The editorial boards of journals, magazines, and newspapers have been adding their $20,000/year salaries to the editors' salaries. The magazine Consumer Reports went further and paid 300 of its editors $100,000 to write more articles for the periodical. The reasons given by the editors and publishers were the need to "bring in" greater circulation and better advertising returns. Each editor was also needed to write for many different articles. How could the editors possibly write for more than one article on the same subject if they also needed to go to the print business on this subject? The editors' salaries have been an increasingly important part of the total expense of publishing a journal. Special emphasis has been placed on editor salaries because they often seem to account for more than 50% of an average journal's expenses. The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports that, in 1978, the average salary for an article reviewer was $58,000. The bureau further reports that the average salary for journal editors was $75,000 per year—a substantial increase from the $32,000 that editors were paid in 1969. Who pays the editors? The BLS report says: Journal circulation has been declining while editors' salaries have been rising over the past decade. What is interesting is that the BLS indicates that journal circulation has been declining while editors' salaries have been rising. Clearly, more than one of these two factors is affecting the circulation. 2. There are, of course, other ways to lower a magazine's costs. How about making the magazine's printing charges, postage, and circulation a revolving account each year? Each year's shipment of magazines and newspapers could be sent out for circulation on the first day of that month. There are other ways of bringing down expenses. Could the editor and other editorial staff members be paid a series of lump sum bonuses? Could the magazine enter into some kind of cooperative publishing arrangement with established trade publishers? As editors, how can we control our expenses
