CEDAR CITY — As Utah settles into winter's arctic conditions, school officials are considering bringing back classes into session and local law enforcement are taking extra precautions to make sure students are safe. "We'll be looking at the weather conditions, and it's not like we're dealing with fires or anything, so we feel like people can be outside," said West Valley School District spokesman Scotty Johnson. He said the district is hoping classes can resume as early as late January or early February in an effort to give students a school holiday. The school district is also considering classes to be held at community sites in rural areas, he said. Article continues below

The district announced Jan. 27 that it would close school on Feb. 3 and re-open on Feb. 4. Since then, school district officials have been meeting with county and state officials, law enforcement agencies, the Utah Department of Health and community members. "We're taking a good look at what we've already done," Johnson said. "We've seen that we've been able to shut schools down in similar situations before, and we want to make sure we're prepared and make sure that the kids are safe and kids are smart."

In 2018, Cedar City School District officials closed its school district after the Cedar City School Board decided to close one school because the district was forced to re-locate school buses from other areas due to poor road conditions. In 2018, the Cedar City School Board decided to close one school because of poor road conditions. The school board decided to save $250,000 that year by closing the 6th and 7th grade building on Main Street and merge the two schools into one middle school building. In 2017, Ricks Spring School District in the Morgan County area announced its school district would be closing until Feb. 7 because of icy road conditions. Before the closure, the board decided to merge the district's six schools and make it a four-year middle school and
