See, e.g., Pet'r's Br. at 24 ("In the context of this case, the D.C. Circuit held that the Secretary of the Department of the Interior did not violate the [Administrative Procedure Act], even though he completely failed to keep a promise to help landowners obtain reimbursement, because the landowners had no legal right to any of the funds."); id. at 25 ("Here, petitioners' right to the $2.6 million did not ripen until the DOI finally determined that they would be eligible for a payment."); id. at 26 ("[T]he [D.C. Circuit] noted that petitioners would have had a right to the funds if they had been able to prove that they actually suffered a compensable loss and thus would have been entitled to a portion of the funds."). Thus, petitioners argue, the Solicitation Regulations are not ripe for judicial review because intervening events make it impossible for petitioners to prove that they have a compensable interest in the funds, i.e., an interest to which they are legally entitled. See Pet'r's Reply Br. at 2. Petitioners misread the D.C. Circuit's opinion in Platte River II. The D.C. Circuit did not hold that the landowners were never entitled to funds but that the landowners were not entitled to the 8 benefit of a "but for" test because their ultimate right to the funds arose after the earlier proceedings concluded. In order to be entitled to the benefit of that legal test, the landowners had to have established that they were "the true beneficiary[s] of the
