This bill is the result of a class action lawsuit involving a photographer, Mark Gold-Smith, and a photographer who claims to own the copyright to the image, Tom Furlong. Gold-Smith shot Furlong in a demonstration at a music video shoot for Chicago-area band/DJ, The Virgins, and Furlong wanted to use the images in another project. The problem? Gold-Smith sold his images to the band as a marketing tool to promote the band; when The Virgins' issued their first CD in 1999 they didn't have to pay him. Gold-Smith says he owns the copyright to the image – and Furlong is arguing he does not. The law would clarify that a photographer who sells an image as a part of their job, either for their own benefit or for the benefit of another, don't own the copyright. This would protect independent photographers from exploitation, but it also impacts wedding photographers, realtors, and many others who sell images. Hear about the legislation from two photographers, a copyright specialist and an Iowa State University professor who have worked on this bill. (Reprinted from the National Consumer Law Center) Host Lisa Sorg is a copyright attorney, host of the podcast "Legal On The Rhine", and author of several books on copyright. Artist, educator, and author Joel Trotter is a graphic designer, artist, and art instructor. As experts on copyright law, they join us to discuss the bill. What's New In Photoshop CC?

The location of an object is determined with respect to an image or a 3D model of that object. The location is a relative value that is related to the location of a camera capturing the image. When an object is captured by the camera, certain attributes or properties of that object may be detected. Each attribute or property of an object has a respective location, usually defined with respect to the object itself, and the location of the respective property is often expressed in a relative value related to the location of the object. For example, a dimension or angle of an object may have a specific location relative to the object. Other properties may also have locations, such as an intensity, color, or wavelength of light reflected by or transmitted through a surface of the object. The location of the attributes of an object may be determined from analyzing captured images, projected images, and/or 3D models of the object. For example, the location of an object can be determined from a captured image by measuring the distance of a point on the image to a specific location in space. Such a point can be defined as a pixel in an image or, alternatively, as a point in space. In one example, the location of the object can be determined by using a pattern of points on an object. For example, a solid object can be illustrated by a set of points on the surface of the object. An end-point of each of these points defines a plane and all of the points on the plane are connected in a network, e.g., a Voronoi tessellation. One object can be identified by the tessellation of the solid object. The location of the object, and other properties of the object, can be determined from the network of points. The location of an object is expressed by the location of a point on the object. For example, if the object is a solid, the object can be identified by the network of points, the location of a point is determined from a position of the point in the image, and the location of the object in the image is obtained by identifying the nearest points in the network to the point in the image. However, the location of an object may not be an accurate representation of the actual location of the object. As a result, it may be desirable to adjust the location of the object based on an actual location of the object. As an example, the location of an object can be adjusted based on an error, e.g., a distance from an actual location
