It's not for hunting, but for preparing carcasses before slaughter. The movement of livestock through mountainous terrain to slaughterhouses in Italy, known as "porzione," has helped keep vast quantities of meat in people's bellies, feeding the industry and providing jobs. Italy is the second-largest market in Europe for sheep, beef and pork, according to Livestock's Long Shadow: Environmental Issues and Options, a report released Thursday by the United Nations Environment Programme. More than 5 billion kg (11.2 billion pounds) of meat sold in Italy was produced by livestock, mostly in sheep and cattle, the report said. But high demand and surging demand in less developed countries has outstripped the animals' ability to keep up. While supplies meet around 80% of demand in Europe, this year the shortfall is forecast to be around 160 million head of livestock, according to the United Nations report. "The porzione has become increasingly an endgame system. It's not a system which we can call sustainable. We need to stop this, and this is not easy," Francesco Majolo, a spokesman for the Italian Farmers Union, told The Associated Press. The porzione system has been a constant throughout Italian agriculture for centuries, since moving animals along narrow and often impassable roads kept costs down and kept meat affordable. Increasing public appetites, has meant more animals are needed. For a country of only 5 million beef cows and 50 million beef cows and 50 million beef cows and 50 million beef to be.
