Wind power is considered one of the cleanest, most environmentally friendly energy sources presently available, and wind turbines have gained increased attention in this regard. A modern wind turbine typically includes a tower, generator, gearbox, nacelle, and one or more rotor blades. The rotor blades capture the kinetic energy of wind using known airfoil principles. For example, rotor blades typically have the cross-sectional profile of an airfoil such that, during operation, air flows over the blade producing a pressure difference between the sides. Consequently, a lift force, which is directed from a pressure side towards a suction side, acts on the blade. The lift force generates torque on the main rotor shaft, which is connected to a generator for producing electricity. The size of a blade is dependent upon the design point of the wind turbine. Blades may be formed as a hollow shell with a top view and a side view that is substantially rectangular or substantially trapezoidal. Hollow turbine blades may be constructed of a parent material, such as fiberglass, or may be formed of composite materials (such as carbon fiber). Various manufacturing techniques may be used for constructing hollow blades. For example, fiberglass blades may be created by laying up fiberglass filaments on a mandrel, while carbon fiber blades may be constructed in a filament winding operation. A filament winding operation is a form of rotational molding in which a supply of fiber filaments are installed to form a fillet of fibers in the interior of a mold that rotates around a stationary mandrel, similarly to the winding of a traditional rolling band. The mandrel can be removed after the filament winding operation. Blades made of composite materials are generally stronger than similar hollow blades made of glass, but are also much more expensive to make. While manufacture of blades in filament winding operations has been performed successfully in the past, the process may be cumbersome, slow, and inefficient. For example, filament winding may produce a symmetrical wind turbine blade with a specified orientation for the fibers. A need therefore exists for improving the efficiency of manufacturing hollow blades.package com.github.knightliao.canalx.core.client; import com.github.knightliao.canalx.core.response.EndpointException; import com.github.knightliao.canalx.core.response.Response; import java.io.IOException; import java.net.SocketException; import java.util.
