The.Our conventional strategies for neural regeneration after spinal cord injury (SCI) are in need of improvement. By understanding the pre- and post-injury mechanisms in these therapies that are now available, we hope to bridge the gap between a moderate level of neurological recovery and the full restoration of function. Recent evidence suggests that traditional neuroprotection strategies, which may limit neural degeneration and support survival of vital neurons, may also hinder repair and recovery after injury. Based on a better understanding of what might occur in the injured neural environment, new therapeutic strategies to improve recovery are emerging. Specifically, transplantation of neurotrophic factors to the spinal cord to increase cell survival and axonal regeneration, and electrical stimulation to promote oligodendrocyte growth and remyelination have all shown some degree of promise to improve recovery after SCI. Furthermore, emerging evidence suggests that neurons of the lateral column of the spinal cord may be capable of remyelination. Building on recent publications which demonstrate that transplantation of growth factors may improve recovery, we propose to investigate the potential of electrical stimulation to enhance oligodendrocyte and/or neuronal remyelination. We hypothesize that treatment of SCI with electrical

The angiotensin AT1 receptor antagonist irbesartan is a novel antihypertensive agent which has demonstrated cardioselectivity in early clinical studies. We sought to determine the effect of irbesartan in models of cardiac or renal vascular tone. We also evaluated the interaction of irbesartan with endothelium-derived nitric oxide to determine whether the vasoprotective effects of the drug were associated with the activation of endothelial nitric oxide synthase. Vascular smooth muscle tone was examined in isolated left ventricular and aortic rings from Sprague-Dawley rats. Renal vasoconstrictor responses were measured in anesthetized Sprague-Dawley rats. Cardioselectivity of irbesartan was demonstrated in vascular smooth muscle responses (endothelium-denuded thoracic aortic rings
