Hemorrhage, which may be spontaneous or iatrogenic, is a potential complication of any surgical procedure. Surgical hemorrhage is common, and it is a complication which demands special attention, as it carries a substantial risk of morbidity and mortality. The spectrum of surgical hemorrhage includes hematomas, vascular disruptions, vascular injuries, intravascular coagulopathy (liquor amnii, anticoagulants), and hemorrhage associated with surgical procedures (lacerations, organ injuries). The pre-, per-, and post-operative management of surgical hemorrhage has been reviewed. HEMATOMAX, a lyophilized blood substitute composed of polyglucin, dextran, and calcium and phosphate ions, has been reviewed with respect to its ability to reduce blood loss, when compared with both homologous and autologous blood transfusions. The development of a new blood substitute which is capable of maintaining the red cell density and pH of whole blood, and at the same time eliminating the risk of transmission of infectious agents and allergic reactions is a formidable challenge for the medical community. Finally, a brief survey of medical and surgical treatment of coagulopathy secondary to fibrinolytic therapy and hext are involved in the suppressive effect of GLW11C on proliferation of HUVECs. The phytochemical extract of the aqueous extract of Lithospermum erythyrohizon is used to inhibit in vitro human umbilical vein endothelial cells proliferation. In this study, we utilized the cell proliferation and migration and migration in a concentration-dependent manner. To investigate the inhibitory mechanism, we analyzed the effect of the extract on the signal transduction pathways, including MAPK and PI3
