An early model of what a support beam for a Sony PlayStation might look like. A Sony patent for a beam-like support for a PlayStation is actually one of the first we've ever seen that looks like something it might actually support. The patent application is for "a console and supporting structure for supporting said console" and it's conceptually quite similar to the design we've seen on the new DualShock 4 controller for the PlayStation 4. The patent describes the "supporting structure" as having a fixed frame, a rigid inner frame, and a pair of telescoping arms each held in place by a spring. The patent's drawings also show the contact pads on the controller, so they would in fact have the same type of design. The patented invention has two holes in the telescoping arms that allow the controller to fit into the console and hold it in place. The patent also says it has two or three feet, just like the PlayStation 3 controller, to keep it upright. The product that would be created by someone who could actually implement a PlayStation-style support beam is only hypothetical right now, but if it were real, it would definitely be a huge advancement over the current PlayStation support. Sony has historically made very few advancements to its PlayStation designs, even as competitors from Nintendo to Microsoft have overhauled and evolved their controllers over the years. Detection of a polymorphic site in the human UBAC2 gene and the resulting association between a UBAC2 haplotype and resistance to vertical transmission of HIV-1. Recently, a potent drug, Ro 25-5396, has been developed, which blocks the ability of human immunodeficiency virus-1 (HIV-1) to use the CD81 receptor. Its influence on vertical transmission was studied by studying the genetic locus involved in the formation of the roxistatin-resistant (R) gene, UBAC2. A polymorphic site was identified at position 337 of the UBAC2 gene that is predictive of resistance to the antiviral action of roxistatin in vitro. This predicted polymorphism was searched for in 51 Italian mothers and their children. The frequency of the resistant G allele was significantly higher in the C infants (P
