The aim of the study was to investigate the dynamics of the above parameters in patients subjected to the one-stage extracorporeal detoxification (OSTD) for treatment of cholelithiasis. OSTD was applied in 45 patients with cholelithiasis under clinical signs of the obstruction of the common bile duct. Blood was collected from the peripheral vein of the patients at the baseline stage of OSTD;  $p$  less than 0.05 was considered as a statistically significant level. The severity of OSTD was established on the basis of the time of the procedure. The therapeutic efficacy of OSTD was determined by means of the therapeutic and operation outcome. Tyrosine kinase receptors are modular proteins containing a tyrosine kinase domain, a membrane-spanning region, and a variable number of immunoglobulin-like domains. See, e.g., Ullrich et al. (1990) supra. The entire extracellular domain of receptor proteins is often highly glycosylated. The tyrosine kinase domain is involved in the transfer of phosphate from ATP to tyrosine residues of the receptor or other substrates. The tyrosine kinase domain is divided into two regions: the substrate recognition region, or sub-strate domain, and the catalytic region, or kinase domain. The carboxy-terminal tail of the receptor, containing regulatory sequences which are phosphorylated after stimulation, is extended as an insert which constitutes the major part of the transmembrane domain. For example, vascular endothelial growth factor receptor-2 (VEGFR-2) is a tyrosine kinase receptor with a similar structure.
