The secret behind this: I resolved to study the Toefl structure a little earlier than day one. It is an extremely practice-centered system, and I became accustomed to it faster as a result. The final bit of the differences, at least in my experience, is that the lessons felt simpler to understand. (If you're thinking about the prep course, I wouldn't stress too a lot over which one you end up taking. (I took the prep course and it absolutely was a great deal easier!) You already know the TOEFL (Test of English as a Foreign Language) is a standardized test used to. The exam is the only "official" way to show that you have the English skills necessary. Can you believe how fast I was able to review the test structure and take my practice test.Q: How to deal with a user who downvoted everything? I've just received a downvote on all of my answers to a question on the office environment. The questions seem OK to me, and I suspect the user is upset with the question and may be trying to get some sort of revenge. Is there a proper course of action for this? In my case, the vote down equated to ~7 points off my reputation, so it would be possible for me to avoid further downvotes. A: I like the comments in your link--but you should also check out the system-implemented vote reversal feature. A: You can flag the question as "other", and include a message telling the OP how this happened, and why
