Later, however, he once again rejected this notion, claiming that his characters came from within and that the Moli so Era did not have an influence on it. Indeed, Moli so is responsible for establishing the gothic realism character for the novel, and it was Fuentes who was the first to do so. He achieved this by featuring the tales of a number of women who, with their own lives ruined after the crucifixion of Christ, and with no means of providing for themselves, became mute due to the terrors and worries they had experienced. Their utterances, now through whatever channel was available to them, became a prose parable of the effects of the crucifixion of Christ. Nevertheless, Moli so would have been more of an influence on the novel if it had not been for the fears he provided the main characters with. Fuentes tried to persuade American poet Richard Blanco that Blanco should adapt a portion of the novel as a screenplay for a movie, and it was this idea that led to the creation of the film Amores Perros, which was released in The two films are different from each other, with Amores Perros differing a great deal from the novel, but both have a gothic realism tone and characters of women who are female versions of the main character in Moli so Era, the former film, conversely, being much closer in tone and in plot to the novel than the latter.
