Contents Setting Up Photoshop for the First Time Before starting Photoshop, there are a couple of things you'll need to know. You need to create a new Adobe account if you don't have one, and you need an Adobe Creative Cloud membership for Photoshop and Photoshop Lightroom for work with photography. The more detail you can provide on the first few pages of registration, the faster and more professional you'll look when you create your first Photoshop document. You can register with your name and email address only for now, or you can register with a full name and online name. Choose an online name that is as creative and unique as you are. For example, I choose ICreate, just like what my customers say about the program that I create. The account you create will work in all of the programs on the Creative Cloud, but you will be given access to Photoshop and Photoshop Lightroom. Once you have created your Adobe Creative Cloud account, you'll be able to register the Photoshop CS6 or Lightroom 4 soon and get started right away with those programs. Remember to use a good username with which to sign up. Remember the name you chose for your professional work and don't use your private or family name. Amid all the recent hysteria over the presidency and the economy, one line in a recent interview with Jonathan Alter stands out for how the man appears to be able to speak his mind: "But we should leave the Tea Party alone and move on." The Democrats and their media allies have been hammering the Tea Party since it began to spring up during the uprisings of 2009. Taking cues from the Communist Party, the Democrats have attempted to portray the Tea Party as a racist, extremist movement. But with the help of the Mainstream Media, like Alter, Democrats appear to be taking on the role of Republicans. "Move on," says Alter. But those of us who support the Tea Party can't move on because, for the Tea Party, opposition to the Obama presidency doesn't mean opposition to the Obama agenda. If that's the case, then why did the Tea Party become a force to be reckoned with in 2010? Of course, that's not how it was reported by the MSM. In fact, it was all about Obama. So let's ask the question again: Why did the Tea Party become so powerful in the first place? This time let's also add an economic question to the mix: Why did the Tea Party become so popular among working class Americans? How was the Tea Party movement created? There are a number of ways one can read the tea leaves to answer this question. When it comes to the conservative talk radio hosts who were responsible for the Tea Party's rise, they focused their fire on the government shutdown in October of last year. However, according to Alter, that didn't really raise the popular consciousness of the Tea Party movement. "As soon as the shutdown ended in October, that was the high point of the Tea Party. I mean, it was the third most popular video on YouTube by the time of the election. It was never about the shutdown," Alter explained. As for the popular support for the Tea Party, Alter pointed out that those numbers started rising in November of 2010. That's because there was a lot of economic discontent among Americans thanks to Obama's economic policies. "These are not the people who are showing up in primaries and caucuses," Alter said. "These are the people who felt sort of eclipsed by the rise of the Tea

The present invention relates generally to the field of electronic information retrieval and, more specifically, to techniques for extracting synonym information from documents. A Web search engine is an Internet-based application that allows users to search the Internet for documents, such as, for example, web pages and images. A typical Web search engine accepts keywords as input and generates a web page listing links to web pages that contain those keywords. A portion of such a web page can also be used to allow a user to submit a new keyword query for which it is desired to generate a new web page listing links to web pages that contain those keywords. A search engine typically uses a "spider" that crawls through a given collection of web pages and visits each page. The spider can index and store information about the web page, such as the title and the content of the web page. As the spider crawls, it follows links on the visited pages and records information about the web pages it visits. In this manner, the spider builds a database of information that it indexes. A search engine normally uses the indexed information to generate a list of links to the relevant web pages. These links can be generated in a variety of ways. One common method includes visiting a web page and returning to the search engine a text extract of that web page that includes one or more keywords. The keywords are typically provided by the user in a query, which can be a single keyword provided by a user or a phrase-based search provided by a user. Further, the index allows a user to find other, related web pages to the one the user is viewing. In order to find the related web pages, the search engine provides a list of the web pages that it finds to be relevant to the one the user is viewing. Each of the related web pages is usually visited by the spider. When a spider visits a web page, it typically records information, including the title of the visited web page. The recorded information is stored in an index and, in some cases, is stored as metadata that accompanies the link. A search engine can typically provide various types of information about the web pages in its database. It can provide basic text and HTML extractions. The search engine can also generate a summary of the content, and can perform various other types of operations on the web pages in the database. For example, the search engine can also be used to find other related web pages. Dictionaries Dictionaries are typically used to provide the text
