diagnosis in pseudarthroses and inflammations of the carpal bones]. CT is the modern X-ray method for the local diagnosis and follow-up of the pseudarthroses and inflammations of carpal bones. It meets some shortcomings of the conventional X-ray methods, e.g. X-ray film. It allows: 1. the evaluation of the soft-tissue structures surrounding the joint and precise determination of the osseous remodeling of articular surfaces; 2. the registration of the bone mineral density (BMD) which is an important parameter in assessing the risk of non-union and secondary bone resorption; 3. the precise evaluation of the healing process at osteotomy sites. The most informative technique for the evaluation of the postoperative outcome is CT. It allows a good definition of fracture healing. It shows that bone remodeling involves mainly the periosteum and the marrow space of the bone, but also the soft tissues, particularly the fasciae of the superficial soft tissues and muscles of the hand. CT makes it possible to estimate the amount of bone mineral removed from the bone stock and the extent of bone marrow space still present after fracture fixation. It can evaluate the healing process at osteotomy sites and detect the osteoid formation. The bone density is influenced by local factors as well as systemic factors. In the latter case, abnormalities of bone metabolism are to be expected. { "id": "de-DE", "name": "Kanton Ticino", "officialName": "Kanton de Ticino", "relevance": "british overseas territory", "wikipedia": "de:Ticino", "languagesCovered": ["de"], "motto": "Mens ut
