Feed your hunger for popular .Q: Why did Google exit the whole Bump API? I have been playing around with the Bump API and Google Play Games for a while. Today I run into the following strange situation: I started an integration with Google Play Games on the server side, I did my own "authentication flow" and authenticated for the users I want to use. This works. I made my Android app with the built-in Google Play Services and the new version 1.6 of the "Bump" Android app, using the activity flow "Invite others to join" (after a user clicks on my app in the Play Store) User's come to my app, they do their login. I send them the app version and the app ID (in the background asynchronously) They are successfully returned to the app asynchronously. I get successful response back from the server. The user's are waiting for the message in my app. After a very long time, if they call my app directly via the adb shell com.example.bump | sh in a shell, then I get a "Connection closed" with an "I/O error" in the log. If I login to my Google Play Games website, and view the "Bump" app, I get a "Oops!" message saying that the app has been discontinued (what I'm pretty sure is the reason why). I can confirm that (2), (4), and (5) are working perfectly. I'm glad to say that the Play Games website is still working (at least the game rooms are working, I don't try to do anything there). Can anyone tell me what happened
