In fact, that same year, Smith & Wesson introduced the.Carbodiimide-induced acrosomal permeabilization of human spermatozoa: a kinetochore protein level change associated with this phenomenon. Although it is believed that an acrosome reaction leads to the expulsion of an acrosome-intact sperm into the oviduct, it is also acknowledged that there is a junctional change in the manchette structure before and during the acrosome reaction. In an attempt to understand better this process, human sperm were exposed to different concentrations (0.05-1 mM) of the carbodiimide compound, 1-[3-dimethylaminopropyl]-N-ethylcarbodiimide hydrochloride (EDC). Acrosomal loss of spermatozoa was determined by the release of [14C]chymotrypsin from the acrosome, and immunofluorescence microscopy by indirect immunofluorescence and flow cytometry were used to evaluate the kinetochore level changes. A significant increase in acrosomal loss and an increase in the immunofluorescence pattern of the sperm kinetochores and in the mean fluorescence intensity of the flow cytometry data were observed at 1 mM of EDC. Further studies revealed that the viability of EDC-treated sperm was not altered. The results indicate that acrosomal permeabilization of spermatozoa induced by EDC is associated with an alteration of kinetochore protein distribution, which may be a molecular mechanism of acrosome loss.Q: What is an iRate? I was reading an article by Amanda Storm of Discover about a test to see what articles on the web people are actually reading. One of the tests she described was titled iRate. I've never heard of the name, and I'm not sure if this sort of test exists any longer, but I was curious what the thing actually was. I Googled the name, and it revealed only a short description by the creator of the test and nothing about what iRate actually is
