The world-class science team at the JPL in Pasadena, Calif., made sure we were informed of this vital scientific event. The pyrotechnic keying of Curiosity was triggered on Jan. 14, 2014, as the rover approached the point where the sky fell low enough for the movement of the sun to change the angle at which it shone on the planet's surface. This is called "solsticing." "Solsticing is the process by which the sun changes over the course of a Martian year in its inclination to the equator - a full orbit of the planet - and thus changes the illuminating angle on the surface," said Emily Lakdawalla, a solar system program scientist with the Planetary Science Institute in Tucson, Ariz. Despite having witnessed three sunrises and sunsets, Curiosity's science team did not know until the end of last year that it had, in fact, observed the solar eclipse on Sol 622. We had predicted that it would not be able to see the sun at the moment of the eclipse. "In fact, for six days, the rover was in the shade of the atmosphere," said JPL's Curiosity project manager Richard Cook. As the sun changed position, it was silhouetted in front of Mars by the atmosphere at all times of the year - until the moment of the solstice. As the atmosphere slowly rotated around the sun, the shadow was lengthening and curving. The shadow was a bit longer than when the sun was directly overhead and was streaking toward the east-southeast horizon. "We could see that the angle between the sun and the horizon was changing and that the 1cdb36666d
