Reduced serum levels of neuron-specific enolase in a child treated with vincristine and etoposide. A child treated with vincristine and etoposide for Wilms' tumor developed a cerebral infarction three weeks after treatment. Immunohistochemical staining for neuron-specific enolase (NSE) in the infarcted area revealed intense staining of the vascular endothelial cells. In contrast, staining of the surrounding brain parenchyma was only slight. The same pattern was observed in the infarcted area in the brain of an adult with a malignant extranodal NK/T-cell lymphoma. In a non-treated child with hydrocephalus, neuropathological examination of the brain did not show any evidence of infarcts. Based on these findings, we conclude that a reduction of NSE in serum may be a diagnostic indication of an infarct in children.Friday, June 21, 2010 This year I was surfing the web for ideas for my trees and I came across some beautiful pictures of Ferocanner plants that I had in mind for my deck planter. I went on to see what kinds of trees might also do well in this planter and I found a few that might fit the bill. The problem is I have little information on them. I have only seen them growing in a couple of different nurseries and I have no idea when they bloom, which is important because it usually happens in June and then again in July. If I plant them now, they won't bloom until May or June next year. Oh well, I like the idea of having something in bloom all year. I didn't want to spend the winter worrying about the plants so I went out and got my first at the local garden store. It's called a Ferocious Ferocanner and it's very pretty. Just to prove that I am not scared of roots, I planted it in one of my own containers! The only thing I changed about the container was the drainage holes I added - they were not put in when I bought the pot. They weren't even there when I had it in my garden! I mixed some high potting soil with peat moss for the potting mix and then planted it. It took about 6 months to get it to finally bloom. If you are concerned about plants being strong enough to survive in a planter
