Plasma histamine concentrations rise in the dark following 30 min of exposure to light in the same room or in the dark elsewhere. The rise was maximal at 30 min of illumination. It was not influenced by topical anaesthesia but could be prevented by anesthesia of the skin by painting the hands, forearms and face with 20% ethanol (9 ml/60 min) applied to the skin. When the same treatment was given to dark adapted subjects plasma histamine concentrations increased to a lesser extent than in light. Light-dark differences in plasma histamine were no longer seen after topical anaesthesia. A survey of current programs with students with multiple disabilities: implications for developing an undergraduate program at an Australian university. This study was designed to understand how current university programs with students with special needs are run, what support services and resources are available, and how this relates to students' success. An online survey was used to collect data on current programs with students with multiple disabilities (N = 31) and the support services and resources available to support students in the program. The results of the survey revealed that the current programs did not comply with recommendations for programs with students with multiple disabilities made by the Queensland Executive Council for the Employment of People with Special Needs (2007). The survey results suggested that the programs identified provide support in the areas of training, classroom activities and work experience, and psychosocial support, but that these areas were not clearly defined in the programs. This study provides an understanding of the current programs for students with special needs in their undergraduate study programs. This study has implications for the development of an undergraduate program at an Australian university and provides information for other universities considering developing a program with students with multiple disabilities.
