This study was performed to determine the validity of routine prophylactic and therapeutic neck dissection in cases of laryngeal and hypopharyngeal cancers. The records of 544 patients with laryngeal and hypopharyngeal cancers were reviewed. The standard treatment, usually involving radiotherapy and surgery, consisted of concurrent chemoradiotherapy followed by total laryngectomy or chemoradiotherapy alone. The patients then underwent either neck dissection (prophylactic and therapeutic) or none (superficial neck dissection). A multivariate analysis was done, with results depending on factors influencing prognosis (disease-free survival, local control, and survival), and also on the possibility of therapeutic and/or prophylactic neck dissection. The factors considered were: age, sex, disease stage, tumor location, histologic type, and treatment method. Disease-free survival was significantly related to disease stage and tumor location. Local control was significantly
