What's New in the Photoshop 2022 (Version 23.0.1)?

A New York Times Magazine profile on filmmaker Michael Moore reveals that former Vice President Dick Cheney has a hard time learning Moore's line about Iraq. Cheney tells Moore, "I don't care what this guy says, what he did, he was wrong." Moore comments, "God, this is such a disaster. The man has lost his mind. He's unhinged." That exchange is a very awkward point of any interview in which a public figure is made to look foolish. Moore is no easy mark: he's brash, bombastic, and a hard-charging film director whose political projects include "Roger & Me" and "Bowling for Columbine." He didn't put Cheney on the defensive in the magazine piece, or in other interactions with him. But Cheney's lack of a response to Moore's comments is telling. The Cheney/Iraq war anecdote comes in the context of discussion of an older video in which Moore's "Soul of a Citizen" fuses the pain of the Iraq War with discussion of government surveillance. At 1:03 in the video, Moore says, "A long, long time ago, they've been watching you... [Cheney is] able to use the Patriot Act to build a database of all of us." Other than Moore's opening remarks, the Cheney clip is the only time he is seen in the video. Moore defends the debate-in-print-as-action aspect of the Soul of a Citizen project by pointing out that he had a debate scheduled on MSNBC with Rep. Henry Waxman (D-CA) the next day. Both men have been major advocates of digital privacy. "If you get it out there," Moore says, "they can't do anything about it. If they've given an okay to the request to FOIA, they would tell you if they denied it." Still, one might consider what Cheney said as a microcosm of his broader critique of the Obama administration in general, and of the NSA in particular. "At this point, the President is not the Commander in Chief, he is the Chief Lawyer," Cheney told the Washington Post in December 2008, answering a question about Obama's executive powers.
