1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to dental hygienic products, and more particularly, it relates to a method of attaching a dental hygiene product to a tooth. 2. Description of the Related Art Numerous dental hygiene products are commercially available. Such dental hygiene products include, but are not limited to, dental floss, and dental tapes and stickers. Dental floss or dental tape has one or more fibers attached to one end which are able to clean the spaces between teeth. Typically, the floss or tape has a first segment attached to the end of the product, which is formed from a soft material such as rubber or foam. The floss or tape is then threaded through the spaces between teeth and moved through the soft, flexible material to provide additional cleaning to the spaces between teeth. A problem with current methods of manufacturing dental hygiene products is the difficulty in efficiently attaching the end of the dental hygiene product to a tooth or a surface which is to be cleaned. For example, it is difficult to thread dental hygiene products through spaces between teeth with one hand. Often, a user is required to thread the dental hygiene product with one hand and handle the product with the other hand. Alternatively, a user may be required to hold the dental hygiene product with one hand while attempting to thread a needle through the first segment with another hand, thus making the process cumbersome. Current attachment methods for attaching a dental hygiene product to a tooth or other surface involve the use of adhesives. However, these adhesive attachment methods typically require the application of an adhesive to a cleaning surface, such as a tooth or the surface to be cleaned, and then to the first segment of the dental hygiene product. The cleaning surface and the first segment are then pressed together to secure the adhesive to the first segment. Such adhesive attachment methods are problematic for several reasons. First, current adhesive attachment methods are time consuming and labor intensive because the adhesive must be applied to the cleaning surface and the first segment. Also, the cleaning surface and first segment must be pressed together for a relatively long period of time in order to assure that the adhesive is properly applied. Additionally, current adhesive attachment methods require the user to handle the dental hygiene product with a single hand, thereby potentially transferring the adhesive to the user's single hand. Therefore, a need exists for an attachment method which is simple, efficient, and effective. Some dental hygiene products attach to the surface to be cleaned through the use of self-welding or welding adhesives. However
