The challenge is particularly pronounced for young people who, while often digital natives, are not used to getting their information from unreliable sources. President Enrique Pena Nieto has said that the problem has reached "huge proportions," with misinformation making its way into classrooms, football stadiums and government buildings. For years, the Mexican government has been warning people about the dangers of fake news. But the topic has been neglected in recent weeks as people have been too distracted by the one-two punch of Hurricane Patricia and Sunday's Day of the Dead celebration. Mexico's government, along with the United States' government and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, are taking steps to try to clean up the mess by exposing and removing fake information.
