The Data Analysis team in the Life World Studios Playbook sprint collected tracking data for a full FIFA 21 gameplay session, which was then processed with the team's custom motion capture software. The software was originally designed to enable developers to analyze their own motion capture data, but it was adapted so that an entire FIFA 22 gameplay session could be processed in a few hours. "Our aim was to revolutionize the motion capture process to achieve the highest quality results," Simon Bannister, senior game play producer at Life World Studios, told FIFA.com. "Because our software isn't just a game-changer - it's so fast and accurate, it allowed us to collect lots of data for FIFA 22. "We had to analyse the stats from the session, collect all of the tracking data and feed it back into our system to make the final version of the game. It was a game changer for us." The resulting technology was used to produce the opening eFootball PES demo, which demonstrated the power of the new level of control on the ball. The demo footage was also used in the FIFA TV commercial. "The demo was an important project for us," added Bannister. "It showed that we had a product that could deliver a unique and exciting experience. We're now very happy to use the same technology to deliver the best football experience yet." The process began at the 2012 FIFA U-20 World Cup in Turkey, when FIFA used the technology to improve the accuracy of their small ball simulation in FIFA 13. For the U-20 World Cup, the software was used to analyze match ball positions, so that their shape could be replicated in-game, closely matching the official ball used by the competition. At the time of the competition, the technology was new, but it was an instant hit. Bannister says that it has since helped teams all over the world win football matches and gain crucial information about match tactics, opponent shape and the physicality of the players. "Once teams could see how a ball behaved in-game, they were able to discover new tactics and counter-tactics to make their players more comfortable during the game," he said. "It's another example of how technology has helped to empower player movements." Now, with the

The generation of amyloid-beta peptide (Abeta) plays a key role in the pathogenesis of Alzheimer's disease (AD) and Down syndrome, a neurodegenerative disorder that afflicts approximately 11% of the population in the United States. Thus, there is considerable interest in the design of drugs that target Abeta generation and/or its pathological deposition. The amyloidogenic processing of the amyloid precursor protein occurs sequentially through a series of intramembrane cleavages. The best characterized of these cleavages, which generates the Abeta peptide, occurs at the amyloid-beta cleavage site of the transmembrane amyloid precursor protein by the enzyme gamma-secretase. We have examined the structure-activity relationship of a series of sulfonyl fluoride inhibitors that target this intramembrane cleavage. The sulfonyl fluorides selectively inhibited the secretase activity of the gamma-secretase enzyme complex, resulting in an overall decrease in the production of Abeta peptide. The most potent compounds also inhibited the production of soluble Abeta precursor protein (APPP). Sulfonyl fluorides with a free thiol group on the thioester side chain were as effective as the fluoroalkoxy sulfonyl fluorides in lowering Abeta and APPP. These results indicate that sulfonyl fluorides represent a novel class of highly effective inhibitors of amyloidogenic processing, thus representing potential therapeutic agents for the treatment of AD and Down syndrome.
