Effects of prenatal alcohol exposure on thermoregulatory responses to restraint stress in mice. The influence of prenatal alcohol exposure (PAE) on thermoregulatory responses to restraint stress was studied in mice. PAE was induced by feeding pregnant dams with 5% (v/v) ethanol (EtOH) beginning from gestational day (GD) 0 to 16. At approximately GD20, dams were euthanized by cervical dislocation and litters from control or PAE dams were kept together. Mice were weighed on postnatal day (PND) 11 and were subjected to a restraint stress test on PND12. Animals were tested for the latency to immobility, and for the latency to a 30-s moving of the body during a 10-min stress session. After a 30-min rest, they were placed back in the same restraining box, and assessed for the latency to immobility once again. Three of 15 pups in each dam were removed from the litter at random, and behavioral testing was then carried out on them. Body weight was not different on PND 11 in the treated group compared to controls ( $p > 0.05$ ). On PND 12, PAE males were heavier than controls (p
