Google Google's initiative to ditch paper forms for company documents, such as tax and company filings, has been accepted by the EU Data Protection Commissioner after a two-year negotiation. The General Data Protection Regulation will allow company documents to be submitted digitally, rather than as a paper form, so long as certain conditions are met. Google first announced it was moving to digital filing of company documents in 2011, and has been working on making the switch for the past two years. The move is expected to be a boon for companies that process large numbers of documents, such as legal firms. Related: More than half of us have an online ID problem Precise details of how the new rules will work are still being hammered out. But Google said: The GDPR will require that any information that companies hold about individuals is kept secure and that individuals retain control over their personal information. We will remain committed to working with policymakers and regulators, and to developing new ways to collect, store and use data in the service of the public interest. On the company's blog, Google's law firm, Google General Counsel Kent Walker, noted that the current, paper-based process for companies was "suboptimal and inefficient," and that the internet-based one would be more secure and allow more transactions. Google has been working closely with EU officials since 2011 to build its filing system. "This milestone is
