1. Script Maker-Script Maker is used for creating websites as well as for Flash scripts. It is a creative and fun tool for building experiences with websites and Flash. It allows you to create custom websites and animations with virtually no programming knowledge. It is similar to the Flash AS3 tools. It has step by step instructions that lead you through the process of writing scripts. Script Maker's interactive interface encourages you to create scripts in a language similar to Adobe Flash's ActionScript. You can add an XHTML or HTML style engine to create dynamic content that is rich in multimedia. Script Maker can be used for creating interactive websites, games, interactive advertisements, slideshow presentation, and image galleries. The program has free tutorials and guides to help you get started. Adobe does not charge for the Script Maker trial version. It allows you to try out the product for 30 days.

Q: Plotting multiple lines for different sets of data points using ggplot2 in R I have created a model in R where I calculate the Pearson's correlation coefficient between 3 different datasets of values which I then store in 3 files. I then want to plot the results in a nice way which means I have to plot each of the 3 files separately. I have tried to achieve that by creating a data frame with the names of each files and the correlation coefficient values. This seems to work but when I try to plot it with ggplot2 I get the error: Error in plot.new() : first argument must be a plot object This is my data frame and the actual plot I want to create: data_files

Orientation-dependent stability of visual masking. The stability of visual masking is highly dependent on the visibility of the masks. The present research shows that the magnitude of the masking effect also depends on the orientation of the masks in a stimulus display. An array of two stimuli (one target and one mask) is presented. Masking is assessed through the observer's ability to correctly identify the target in either the same or opposite orientation to the mask. The mask and target are presented consecutively, one after the other, so that both reach the fovea at the same time. The mask is presented in a single, brief display, so that mask and target are present for the same amount of time but are positioned in a different part of the visual field. The mask is oriented either left or right of the target, and the amount of masking depends on whether the mask and target are in the same or opposite orientation. Under some conditions masking is large only when the mask and the target are in the same orientation. These conditions occur when the observer is looking near the border of the visual field (e.g., at 45 degrees) and the target and mask are presented in the same visual quadrant. The data suggest that a potential disadvantageous consequence of spatial separation of mask and target is that the target and mask do not always arrive at the same time at the observer's fovea. The reality of the 2020 Summer Olympics is changing fast. Up until last week, the assumption was that Rio would be the last time the city hosts the Games. At this rate, they'd be lucky to get another 12 years. Now, an Australian case has emerged to prove that athletes who compete in the Paralympics can use cannabis and that's pretty great. Dylan Blythe is competing in the 1500 metres at London this week. He's an Australian, but he's also a Marine. Which means that in addition to his elite level athletics, he's also a combat veteran. In his spare time, Blythe competes in the lawn bowls. When his wife suggested he might enjoy some cannabis to help with his performance, Blythe was hesitant. "I had never smoked," he said. "But the competition was booked and I knew it wasn't a good idea to break it." As it turned out, the cannabis didn't do anything to
