This invention relates to a recoil mechanism for an air-powered impact gun, and particularly for an impact gun that is hand-held, such as an air gun or a paint gun. Air-powered guns, both pellet guns and paint guns, are well known in the art. Air guns have the advantage of delivering a controlled stream of pellets that never overstrikes the object of the gun. In the case of paint guns, the object is a surface of a structure to be painted. There are other types of impact guns that are powered by the recoil of a spring or a compressed gas cylinder. Such guns deliver a fluid stream propelled by the action of a mechanical piston. For example, such a pump gun may deliver paint, water, or stucco from a tank at a controlled velocity. Such guns have the advantages of being refillable, and permit a smaller stream of fluid at any given pressure than do air guns. In air guns, pellets are delivered by compressed air from a small air chamber in the buttstock. The pellets are shot from an exit tube in the barrel. The barrel is pointed in the direction that the barrel is cocked. In normal operation, after being cocked by cocking the buttstock, the pellet gun is aimed at the target, or targets, and is shot. The pellet, which is expelled from the exit tube, rebounds from the target and recock the barrel. When the barrel is cocked and the pellet is shot, the pellet is expelled from the exit tube at a high velocity. This is the result of compressing the air in the air chamber in the buttstock when the buttstock is cocked. The velocity of the pellet is determined by the length of the path it travels through the air. The longer the path, the greater the velocity of the pellet. As the pellet leaves the air chamber, the air pressure drops. As the pellet leaves the exit tube, the barrel is released from the closed position, in which the pellet is moving at high velocity, and it is cocked. This is referred to as "recoiling the barrel." The velocity of the pellet, and therefore the velocity of the stream of the pellet, decreases as the pellet travels through the barrel. This is why the stream of the pellet is emitted from the exit tube at a high velocity. The air in the air chamber is pressurized by opening a valve in the air chamber and by delivering air

A Comparison of Inpatient and Outpatient Acetabular Fracture Surgery: Is Selection of Treatment Level Influenced by Geographic and Socioeconomic Variables? Maintaining an infrastructure to treat a patient population in need of acetabular fracture surgery becomes a challenge. This study compares the characteristics of patients who underwent inpatient and outpatient acetabular fracture surgery at a Level I trauma center in a diverse, urban setting. All patients with acetabular fractures undergoing operative repair from 2003 to 2015 at a Level I trauma center were identified from the trauma registry. Multivariate logistic regression was used to compare predictors of inpatient versus outpatient surgery. From 2003 to 2015, 948 acetabular fractures were treated operatively by a team of five fellowship-trained orthopaedic trauma surgeons. Of these, 576 (61%) were treated as inpatients. Patient demographics, etiology, type, and laterality of fracture, and Injury Severity Score were similar between groups. Inpatient surgery was associated with a longer length of stay (9.4 vs. 4.4 days, $P = 0.001$) and higher incidence of complications (40.8% vs.
