Q: Check in flyway if database exists in any other server I wonder if it is possible to check if any other server has the same database than the current database. We cannot change the DNS to check if it works since we have many servers with the same hostname. My initial thoughts: We could add two entries in our tables(in our DB). One entry with the database name and its checksum, and another entry with the current database and its checksum. But the checksum will be visible to the users, so we can't use this. I don't see other solutions that don't change our applications. Is it possible to check if an other server has the same database without making an entry? A: This is probably a rather generic question, but I'd like to point out that: check if an other server has the same database without making an entry? Is it allowed to upload your code to a repository like GIT, just for the sake of checking? Depending on your security requirements, you may want to look at something more appropriate. The real answer is: its not possible to look into other datacenters because of the following: a certificate is signed by a certification authority, and in case of a misconfiguration (you are stuck with the certificate, so it would be more secure to not check. If you have root access you can always contact your datacenter and ask them if they have a datacenter in another country, and if so, how your data is protected. If you dont have root access, you are out of luck, especially since that datacenter is probably in a different country and who knows what laws they have. $L e t i (v) = - 4 * v * * 2 + 7 * v - 4$. $L e t f (h) = 2 * h * * 2 - 2 * h - 6$. $L e t a$

Capcom has announced the comeback of Mega Man for the series' 20th anniversary, and it looks like it'll be a doozy of a story. Loading Let's just briefly talk about Mega Man as a whole for a minute here, before we get into what this new title is specifically. In the modern era of Mega Man, we've seen a few spin-offs – Mega Man: Powered Up introduced elements of exploration and free-roaming, and Mega Man X introduced the Mega Buster, which allowed Mega Man to take enemies head-on. Mega Man Zero and Zero 2 seemed to introduce Mega Man completely anew, and we got a good look at his blue barrel design – if we remember correctly. This new Mega Man is a completely new character, with his creators having completely redone his design, form, and the rest of his character design – including weapon and armor. That's clearly the case if you look at the art showcased in the trailer, but this modern Mega Man is also different in many other ways. Mega Man's most recent game in the series was Mega Man 11, which was a big departure from the series's traditional platforming-like gameplay. This new game is being developed by Bluepoint Games, a new studio founded by the team behind the Nintendo DS games Wario World and Wario Land Shake It!, which were both designed with touchscreen gameplay in mind. Players will be able to use the touchscreen to move Mega Man left and right to move through the stages, and the game will also use a steering wheel for movement like it did in Wario Land, but it will also use the touchscreen for the type of actions we've seen in Mega Man 11. The game will be playable in both 2D and 3D, and will have a mixture of classic and modern gameplay. Have a look at the trailer below for a look at the story of this new take on the Mega Man legacy: What is really going on in politics?
