Senator van Rooyen's push for additional nurses at Kgosi Mampuru II does not go far enough EDITORS PLEASE NOTE: This article is written from a South African context and it is meant for the readers of South Africa. A parliamentary committee report released today recommended that the South African Parliament amend section 76 of the Constitution to allow for the registration of private sector nurses and the introduction of a national nurse registration board to develop nurse-training programmes in nursing. It also said that the South African Nurses and Midwives Council (SANDC) be empowered to accredit and supervise private nursing and midwifery programmes, and that a national nurse registration board, comprising medical practitioners, should be established to accredit all nurses and midwives. We have already seen initiatives along these lines, with the introduction of "certified nursing assistant" programmes, the nurse assistant specialisation programme, and the nurse specialist and nurse practitioner programmes. We also have the private nursing programme and the private midwife training and accreditation programme. But most of these initiatives are done ad hoc, and they are not comprehensively thought out. It is my hope that the report would be the catalyst that would enable the profession to develop a policy that would establish nurse registration in the country. Funding But the report is very weak on the funding issue. The NPA has warned that the healthcare system could collapse without some serious re-engineering of the number and location of the healthcare workforce in the country. The Auditor General's report on the health sector should be an eye-opener to the government and health insurance agencies. The report showed that the government spent almost R5 billion on healthcare in 2017, yet only R3.2 billion was invested in nursing and midwifery. Moreover, the expenditure on nursing and midwifery was way below the 3% that is recommended by the World Health Organization. The NPA is therefore recommending the establishment of a national hospital funding agency, which will include healthcare financing, enrolment and a national education, training and examination system that will link to the skills development plan. An important part of this will be to change the licensing and certification of nurses and midwives, like the provision of state registered nurse (SRN) and nurse midwife (SRNM) degrees. The SRNs and SRNMs are the backbone of the healthcare system. The medical for ^{14}C -radiolabeled carbohydrates, which was quantified using ^{14}C standards. Under anaerobic conditions, we detected no significant reduction of ^{14}C MurNAc or ^{14}C GlcNAc, indicating that the pyruvate- and dicarboxylate pools did not accumulate following E. coli growth in MurNAc and GlcNAc, as expected (Supplemental Fig. S2{ref-type="media"}). Figure 3 Radiolabeled MurNAc and GlcNAc uptake by bacterial cells. E. coli strain SU20 (MurNAc and GlcNAc uptake mutant), SU20 pMurNAcT, SU20 pGlcNAcT and SU20 pTrpT were cultured in LB under aerobic conditions and induced with IPTG as indicated. Aliquots (1.5 mL) of each culture were harvested at 10 min, 15 min, 20 min and 30 min after IPTG induction. After dilution with 0.1 M Gly, a further aliquot of each sample was removed, washed with 0.1 M Gly and chased with same concentration of ^{14}C -Radiolabeled MurNAc or ^{14}C -Radiolabeled GlcNAc. Values shown for each time point represent the means and standard deviations for three biological replicates. To investigate whether the uptake defects of the murNAcT and glcNAcT genes in E. coli were also observed using other radiolabeled carbon sources, we radiolabeled E. coli strain SU20, which carries wild type copies of murNAcT and glcNAcT genes with ^{14}C MurNAc and ^{14}C GlcNAc, respectively, with IPTG induction. The results confirmed that both ^{14}C MurNAc and ^{14}C GlcNAc were taken up by the E. coli strain SU20 cells (Fig. 3{ref-type="fig"}). However, we also noted a slight reduction in ^{14}C
