How to Digitize Photos The digital revolution is enabling us to approach photographic processes in a new way. Many years ago, the need for certain traditional methods, such as correction in the darkroom and the use of negative film, gave rise to a whole industry of professionals known as photo labs. But now, a new generation of photographers is growing up with computers in their hands, learned on the Internet, and taught by their friends to see the world through a new lens. Photographs are born digital. The moment you capture a scene, it's immediately digitized. There is a certain limited appeal to capturing a photo on film, because you have to wait to see the image and until then, you don't know whether the scene will make a good composition. However, since there's a digital file, you can change it as many times as you want until it looks perfect and then take it from there. Photographers have always shot and uploaded their images. It's just that the equipment for this was more limited. Most photographers used to rely on a scanner with a flatbed to photograph to a medium-resolution format. These days, you can buy a basic camera with a computer or point-and-shoot digital camera that prints to a 4 megapixel or 8 megapixel resolution.

The Burn Tool (or Bucket Fill) can be used to brighten, copy, or recolor images. It is a great tool for adding contrast to black and white images or for brightening a dark-colored image. The Colorize button can be used to make images look "old-timey" by adding grayscale overlays. The Gradient tool allows you to create a circular or linear gradient fill on the selected area. To create a brush, drag the handles of the gradient to a new area. The Pencil Tool can be used to erase, delete or modify objects. You can add or subtract pixels to generate a new image. The Puppet Warp is a tool that simulates the hair on faces. You can use it to remove or sculpt wrinkles or expression. The Refine Edge tool is used to sharpen, soften, or change the opacity of a selected area of an image. This is useful for removing blemishes or repairing lines and shapes. The Spot Healing Brush is a selection tool that can be used to remove small blemishes or errors in an image. It can be used to fix accidental or intentional changes. The Texture Brush is used to apply specific textures to an image. You can import and use premade textures, but you can also create and use your own. The Typography tools allow you to retype text, add drop shadows, and correct the style of text. You can also use it to soften objects, reduce eye wrinkles and hair, and increase the edges of your subject. The Warp tool lets you move selected objects around an image. You can add blur, blur and focus, and even invert an object. But these tools are all only the beginning. Related Topics VANCOUVER, British Columbia (CNNMoney.com) -- A federal effort to break the boom-and-bust cycle for bond traders has finally rolled out with a new peer-to-peer trading platform. Launched Monday, ProShare seeks to eliminate the multibillion-dollar cost of selling and buying bonds, which is why it's growing as a marketplace for a $12 trillion industry. Businesses and individuals pay interest and other charges to hold bonds, but using the market costs even more, says ProShare CEO Dan Reuer, who co-founded the company with a University of California, Berkeley, classmate. In the investment world, most bond trades are done by dealers who arrange deals at a central desk. But most of those orders are sold and bought at a higher-than-average price, which leads to massive trading costs. "The current market structure allows for limited competition," Reuer says. "We just decided we needed to do this." ProShares says the platform will cut transactional costs by more than 90% and take money out of Wall Street's hands. "There's no such thing as a volume-based fee in the trading world," Reuer says. "The volume of trading done in this industry translates directly into the ability to earn higher commission." ProShares will directly compete with large brokerages by providing customers with more information and features. "The most important point is to engage the best bond traders from around the world," Reuer says. "There's an opportunity to build and monetize a new asset class." Reuer expects to add users to the platform over the next year, and is currently raising a $40 million Series A round to fund expansion. He says the company has already signed more than 40 institutional clients. ProShares is headed up by a team from Citigroup (C, Fortune 500). They include David Franz, a senior managing director of Citigroup's high-yield group, and former Citi Mortgage Capital and Credit Strategies Group executive Susan Mueller, who joined after Citigroup acquired credit-derivatives company Altegris last year. ProShares expects to break even by 2014, meaning investors will eventually make money on the platform. There are two types of bonds: debt securities, which pay interest, and equity securities, which are considered a piece of the company. ProShares currently offers only debt.Many people
