How it works The main tool set, the canvas, is a one-pixel-sized square composed of thousands of pixels. If you've used a bitmap image editor like Microsoft Paint, that's what Photoshop's canvas looks like. It allows you to add, subtract, move and rotate (or transform) the pixels inside it just like you'd lay out and move pieces of a jigsaw puzzle. Creating a new layer is a simple drag-and-drop operation. A drop creates a new layer on top of all other layers. In addition to new layers, you can use layer masks to achieve some tricks, like combining or hiding something. It's often helpful to group layers and commands together. These make it easier to access or work on several items at once. It's also easy to duplicate layers. Photoshop's layers are a standard part of the image-editing process. You'll often hear people refer to layers as "transparency." Of course, it's about the pixels Layers can be edited by pushing and pulling on the white "pixels" in the square. Pushing on them means hiding or deleting them, while pulling on them means bringing them back. It's similar to the way you'd paint with a brush. The layer structure within the image-editing process is much more complicated than just hiding pixels on a square. Each layer has a bunch of attributes that give it a different effect and can be moved, combined, renamed, etc. Open any image in Photoshop and you'll see that there's a lot of stuff floating in that canvas. At the top, you'll see the Document panel, which holds all the current content of the image. At the bottom of the Canvas is the Canvas 1 layer (and its layer groups). Moving it is like setting a page's margin on a layout. All the layers and their tools that are part of that page are moved up with it. If you want to work on just one thing or make a small edit, you can always break the Canvas 1 layer into smaller layers, such as Canvas 1 is divided into Canvas 1 and Canvas 1 (Group). When you create a new layer with the Layer>New Layer command, its layer (together with all layers in its group) is moved up and becomes the Canvas 1 layer. You can see the Canvas 1 layer and all its layers in the

A study conducted by the Home Office has revealed that around 60,000 people are stopped by the UK Border Force (UKBF) at borders or airports every year. The report, The National Security and Resilience Partnership: Assessing the National Security and Resilience of the UK Border Management System, was published today. It highlights a range of problems at the system level, including a number of high-profile delays and failures. Chief executive of the Home Office, Marianne Renwick, said the report "shows clearly that the high-risk service we have to provide is causing friction with British people. "It's simply not acceptable to have major failures so frequently and consistently caused by our staff." Since June last year the number of people caught trying to cross the border illegally has rocketed by 118 per cent, with 2,879 attempts made in 2014. The number of people picked up trying to enter the UK from the non-EU single market more than doubled to 3,136 in the same period, with 1,296 of these people turned away. This was in spite of the UK retaining its Freedom of Movement rights after Brexit, which gave EU nationals the right to move freely. The report found that people were being found through airport and seaport interdiction searches. Of the people stopped, 31.5 per cent were arrested and charged, while a further 26.7 per cent were referred to immigration officials and charged. Only 26.8 per cent were re-directed on to another route because of human error or administrative omission, and only 2.7 per cent were removed due to insufficient evidence for deportation. The government has consistently promised that the UK would build a new border management system to replace the National APIS, which was forced to close when it was found to be insecure. It has also promised to put a new cost on freedom of movement and implement the new system by March 2021. However, it has yet to start the negotiations on its implementation. It has also been accused of trying to conceal a limited number of deaths and serious injuries caused by the system. The government is now considering legislation to give the Home Secretary power to sign the warrant that allows border officials to use lethal force on those fleeing across the border illegally. But Renwick said that if the government was serious about building a secure border, it needed to address the

Hong Kong police say five people have been injured after a new satellite launch vehicle caught fire on the launch pad during a government space programme in southern China. The fire broke out about 05:00 GMT on Monday at the Xichang Satellite Launch Centre, a launch centre used for a range of space programmes, including satellite launches. Hong Kong-based TVB said five of the seven people at the launch site suffered minor injuries, including cuts. Photos and videos showed flames coming from the rocket as the blast landed further away than originally expected. China Aerospace Science and Industry Corp said the fire broke out while a "third-stage fuel tank of an orbital launch vehicle was being filled". The company said it was investigating the cause of the fire. The Xichang Satellite Launch Centre is located in the southwestern province of Sichuan. ( Reuters: Wang Huizhuo ) The launch centre is operated by the China Academy of Launch Vehicle Technology, which is part of the China Aerospace Science and Industry Corp. The launch centre is used for both commercial and government space programmes. It says it has carried out more than 20 successful launches since 2011, including satellites for the Asian country's weather and marine monitoring systems, as well as communications and navigation satellites. Last year, the facility successfully carried China's first lunar lander, Chang'e-4, which landed on the far side of the moon. China has carried out more than 80 successful launches since its first, in 1970. Determination of myocardial ischemia in the elderly. To determine the diagnostic accuracy of exercise stress testing in elderly patients with suspected coronary artery disease. Retrospective study of all outpatients with suspected coronary artery disease undergoing exercise stress testing at Jewish General Hospital between January 1979 and December 1987. The physical examination findings, electrocardiographic and exercise stress test results and coronary angiography results were used as the reference standard. Over a period of 5 years, 1,040 patients were referred for outpatient stress testing with a mean age of 70 years. Of these, 255 (24.4%) had acute coronary syndrome, 823 (79.1%) had other diseases, of which 34 (3.3%) had a history of myocardial infarction. A total of 378 patients (35.6%) met the inclusion criteria for the study. Exercise stress test results were positive for myocardial ischemia in 240 patients (66.4
