Full details can be found in the FIFA 22 media package, which includes a play-by-play of EA SPORTS' HyperMotion Technology innovations. Here's the short version: Zoom (virtual zooming in) The first category of new gameplay features centered on player interaction. You see a line of players, a passing line you would normally see in a static shot. Now you can zoom in closer to see if a defender or midfielder has received the ball and is about to enter the attack or break the line. This new zoom feature mimics many first-person shooters, where zooming in enables you to see enemy movements at a greater depth. It also helps game AI, which has an improved ability to anticipate what players will do. It can see when teammates enter the area around the ball to help support play and intercept passes.

Realistic Player Movement

A second major way that players are interactive is with new physics. AI is improved by new variables, such as ground reaction forces, that allow it to make its pass or tackle decisions based on how the player moves, how quickly it moves and how the ball changes from the moment it is controlled by one player until it is controlled by another. This prevents simulation at its most basic level; simulations and variables are responsible for an accurate representation of a ball in flight and the player's ability to predict how it will move.

Realistic Player Movement Sustain Speed

As speed is often a factor in a player's ability to sustain their run, players will now have a natural tendency to reach down, lengthen the first part of their stride and tap into a higher amount of force to accelerate. There is no touchline at the back of the box, so players will not be punished for taking on-the-ball challenges at speed. This makes them a more constant threat to opponents.

Maximum Speed A new and improved Maximum Speed feature will create more speed on the ball. Players can accelerate at more points than before. This is not used if the player is controlling the ball. The handling and conditions will be faster, which is an essential part of the game.

Dash Dash is a new acceleration mode that allows players to change direction quickly by “breaking” by aggressively changing direction on the pitch. The new feature retains the ball rotation and ball centric moves from previous FIFA titles. Run
